

As the 1920s began, the United States entered an era of profound change. Influenced by the horrors of World War I, Americans sought a return to “normalcy” that included hostility toward immigrants and a fear of foreign influence. While many sought to continue the nativist tradition, others eagerly embraced the new technological developments of the time, especially as they related to a new availability of consumer goods.